Not illustrated. 1868 Excerpt: .and when spoken to, it was found that she was so deaf as not to be able to comprehend what was said, although addressed very loudly. If possible, this deafness increased, so that on the 22nd no sounds were heard, and all communication had to take place in writing. On examination, on the 24th, I found that the deafness was complete; each membrana tympani was very concave and dull; the mucous membrane of the fauces was very red and thick, the tonsils and uvula much swollen. Each Eustachian tube was impervious. Upon inquiry I learnt that accidentally a part of the window had been left open during the night. The treatment recommended was the application of the solid nitrate of silver to the fauces and the orifices of the Eustachian tubes. This was done freely about eleven o'clock on the 26th. Dr. B. returned home about two hours after, and found the hearing so improved that he carried on a conversation with his wife in a loud voice. I might add to the above a large number of cases in which the treatment was quite successful, but will merely give the leading particulars of another. Case VIII.--H. L., Esq., aged 28, consulted me on June 25, 1853. Has suffered for several months from sore throat, consequent upon an attack of secondary syphilis: for two months has complained of deafness in both ears, so as not to hear any except a loud voice. The deafness is...
