She now felt an utter horror of him, and wondered how she could ever have looked with less aversion on the idea of marrying that unprincipled roue, than she had in the contemplation of a union with Mr. Mandeville. She now made an inward vow, that she would never again allow herself to dread the latters love, or look with such horror on the idea of making a person happy who was so unselfishly devoted to her, and who possessed the esteem and approval of her parents. She remembered how coldly she had bidden him farewell that morning, and how glad she had been in her secret heart to walk without him in the scenes dedicated to the memory of Augustus. Her hands were fastened behind her, and, as she could no longer even hear the voice of poor Peggy, in utter despair she gave up all hope of being rescued from her embarrassing situation by ordinary means, and turned her thoughts and prayers to God alone. CHAPTER XII. THE SNARE. Mr. Mandeville had received a letter from an acquaintance in London the preceding day, which informed him that a mercantile concern in which he had a considerable interest was reported to be in a most tottering condition, and that his presence was requisite, to restore confidence, and get matters to rights. Mr. Mandeville had wondered at the anxiety evinced for his presence by a person...
